TESTIMONIALS

I have had the opportunity to see first-hand how LCJ achieves results through a mix of research, draft rules, and advocacy.

Among my experiences as a Fellow, I have presented at the semi-annual meeting on a panel where I discussed the changing arbitration landscape, I organized a virtual happy hour connecting in-house counsel with law firm members, and I became an active member of the cost-allocation committee where I have been involved in the process of drafting a proposed rule related to cost-shifting. In other words, LCJ has truly given me the opportunity to contribute, to learn, and to network with legal leaders throughout the nation.

Through all the important work that LCJ does, one thing that stood out to me the most is how much fun everyone is having. The LCJ membership is welcoming, collegial, and passionate about their work. I look forward to another year as an LCJ fellow especially as I try to welcome the new class of Fellows with the same enthusiasm that I received when I joined LCJ.

The LCJ Fellows program has been an incredible experience. The program brought together a diverse group of attorneys who handle a wide array of matters at firms and in-house legal departments, with the goal of advancing civil justice in our legal system. And, if you've ever described yourself as a civil procedure nerd, there's no better place for you.

I've had the opportunity to develop proposals to modify the rules that we operate within civil litigation. Other members of the organization have been exceedingly generous with their time and feedback, and it's thrilling to see how LCJ has helped me create concrete proposals to remedy problems that I and other members encounter in our practices. People join LCJ because they're sincerely interested in making material changes to our litigation process, and I found a deep bench of support for helping me refine potential proposals to improve the civil rules we operate within.
